Upcoming Change to Room Location Display in Google Calendar

Christopher Grossi - 2019-12-19 - 0 Comments - in IT Knowledgebase

Starting in early January, Google will be making a change to the way that room location information is displayed in Google Calendar. In order to help provide the physical address of the meeting location, the default information in the "detailed view" will be the street address of the meeting. Within the detailed view, the information about the conference room or other resource will be provided in the invitee list on the right of the screen.
For display purposes and ease of viewing, once you are in the “quick view” of the calendar invite, you’ll be able to see both the building location and the room in which your event is being held.

For more details about the change, please see: